Eric Stoltz gives one of his most powerful performances as Frank Stirn, who moves with his family to become a barber for the American Army and POW camp at Fort McCoy, Wisconsin, in the summer of 1944. Embittered that he cannot fight, Frank must take a stand when a Nazi SS Officer threatens his wife (Kate Connor, playing her real-life grandmother). Her Catholic sister falls for a Jewish soldier haunted by the battle of Monte Cassino and the death of his best friend. Camryn Manheim is their audacious friend who encourages the couple, while Seymour Cassel is the priest who cannot. Frank's daughter befriends a German prisoner boy during this magical summer, but war still finds its victims even thousands of miles from the battlefields in rural America.

"A heartfelt, personal film with great performances." - The Hollywood Reporter

"Handsomely crafted. An appealingly sentimental drama about homefront life during W.W.II. Fonseca and Hirsch give winning performances as the young lovers." - Variety

"An undeniable sincerity coupled with a solid cast... there's a strong heartbeat at the center of this film" - Moving Pictures

"Captures the human drama on the homefront as few films ever have" - Examiner

"Elegant. Wonderful. Shows that love and goodness still remain the saving graces of humanity. The performances are excellent. The characters are so rich. Stoltz underplays beautifully. The lovely Connor is the solid center of the film." - We Are Movie Geeks
